Note to Contributors

Journal of Bangladesh Studies (JBS) is a peer reviewed journal published by Bangladesh Development Initiative (BDI) and the Association for Economic and Development Studies on Bangladesh (AEDSB). The focus of this journal is, mainly, to promote the development of Bangladesh.

JBS is directed at individuals who are educated, involved, and interested in development issues. It targets a wide base of readers including academics, students, researchers, policy-makers, administrators, practitioners, donors and their agents, and anyone else who is interested in Bangladesh and its pursuit of development.

Articles are solicited from authors and experts engaged in a variety of fields including agriculture, anthropology, basic sciences, economics, education, engineering, management, political science, psychology, sociology, and related fields. This diversity of perspective is sought by JBS because comprehensive development must be addressed on the basis of a broad foundation of knowledge. Broadly, therefore, the articles should address the country's development problems and prospects from a theoretical or analytical perspective prevalent in academic disciplines. Authors are encouraged to prescribe actions and measures that are meaningful, practicable, and amenable to the sector(s) or issues they address. Articles must also be comprehensible to the wide target audience. In other words, while the articles must be grounded in theory, analysis, and referenced work, they must also reach an audience outside the specific disciplines of the authors without being perceived as popular, journalistic writing.

Both short communications and full-length articles may be submitted. Analysis of recent developments, short reviews of newly published books, and expert comments on specific issues are treated as short communications which should be limited to about 2,000 words. A full-length article should provide a reasonable review of the literature and clearly articulate the nature of the problem or issue it addresses as its focus. JBS also invites critiques of articles published in the journal to foster debate and discussion. Critiques may be published on the basis of space availability (which is often constrained by budget restrictions) and the advice of the editorial board. Critiques must be about two JBS pages and must be written in a positive demeanor to ensure healthy discussion. JBS will attempt to obtain responses from the authors whose articles are critiqued.

Citations in the text should reflect the author's last name and year of publication: (Quddus 1993). If a particular page, section, or equation is cited, it should be placed within the parentheses (Quddus 1993, p. 87).

References are to be presented using the Chicago Manual Style. Examples are as follows:

Rashid, Salim. (1995), "Migration and Bangladesh's Economic Development," Thoughts and Initiatives (a BDI journal), Vol. 2, No. 2, December: 23-52.

Ali, Ashraf (1996), "On Formalization of Bangladesh's Economy," in Development Issues of Bangladesh, Ashraf Ali, M. Faizul Islam and Ruhul Kuddus, eds. University Press Limited, Dhaka, Bangladesh, 1996.

Sobhan, Rehman (1993), Bangladesh: Problems of Governance, Dhaka: University Press Limited.

Endnotes are preferred to footnotes and references must be complete.

Three hard copies of the articles must be submitted first to the editor for the review process. The author's identification, affiliation, mailing address, and e-mail address should be presented only on the title page. An abstract must also be included with the article. The editor may invite a submission subsequently via email and/or on disk using MS Word. WordPerfect files are also acceptable but a Word document is preferred. Revised and accepted articles should be submitted as hard copy and on a floppy disk (IBM or compatible). Opinions expressed in the selected articles are solely the responsibility of the author(s).

Two regular issues of JBS will be published annually. In addition, a special issue on the papers presented at the AEDSB annual meeting is also planned. Articles published in the JBS are not copyrighted. Articles recently published elsewhere may, on rare occasions, be republished in the JBS at the author's responsibility. References that are forthcoming can be considered as such only if the article is in press. The editorial board's decision regarding the acceptance of a submitted article is final. Submitted articles will not be returned to the authors. All papers should be submitted to the editor at the following address
